Download:.Florida Colleges Open To Students With Military Experience After the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, many school officials asked if they could help their students who were veterans find colleges that could help them return to school and receive a degree. But first, universities had to be sure they were qualified to do so. For some, it's a rocky road. Listen Listening... / 2:51 Florida schools are now offering educational opportunities to students with military experience. Waqar Saeed of University of South Florida is a professor and expert in the field of student veterans affairs. He's seen many veterans struggle to get into college. "When I first graduated from college," he said, "there were about 60 students who were veterans." Now that number is up to more than 500. As of the fall 2016 school year, 38 colleges in Florida had started offering degrees and certificates to students who've served. Most of the universities are in the state's Gulf Coast, south Florida and northern Florida. "There are over 1,100 veterans who are attending Florida schools," said Denise Raney, the director of the Statewide Military and Veteran Student Success Network at Florida State University. "That includes international students from 50 countries around the world." Raney says the network helps connect the approximately 7,000 students who've served with opportunities for education. "There are now 37 colleges and universities who have given these same opportunities to students," she said. As with all universities, the applications and admissions process varies from one school to the next. Colby Fulmer, a graduate student at the University of South Florida, says the school helped him figure out where to go to school after he served in the U.S. Air Force from 2004-2009. "They were very helpful," he said. "They actually put me in contact with an advisor who helped me find the right course." Of course, any educational institution might have concerns about whether or not veterans and active-duty service members can handle the rigors of a college environment. "When I was in the military, I was a desk sergeant," said Fulmer, "and I did drill, and I
