You may have heard that Green Bay Packers QB Aaron Rodgers recently underwent a shoulder procedure that will sideline him for the next 3-6 months. He went public with this fact and said that he is optimistic and feels like he'll be back well before training camp. I believe he will be back. I believe that in the wake of this distraction, the coaching staff will be very thorough in their preparation. The training staff and offensive coordinator will spend the time to work out plans for the offense without a QB. The offensive line will be able to work through those plans without a QB. The running game will work out the play calling with our current players. You're an offensive line coach. I want you to imagine that Aaron Rodgers is here but he's not. You're the coach. What would your plan be? How would you work on your plan? How many reps per week would you expect to run?

How many different looks would you expect to see from the defense? What do you think the defense would look like in practice? These are the questions that the coaching staff must answer in preparing the offense in his absence. I would expect them to have this done in advance so that they can address it early in camp. I'd got myself into a bit of a financial hole, and to get out of it I sold my three year old Peugeot 205 6-valve and bought a 1992 Oldsmobile Silvia (more or less). And then, suddenly, the Earth went flat and my world-view changed. The book is based on the car - and the story of how I came to own the car and drive it for nearly ten years. I wrote it for two reasons: Firstly, I wanted to understand why and how I became like I am. And secondly, I wanted to change myself
