Many people, like myself, experienced this tragedy in a visceral way. But one of the most disturbing elements of the incident was Pantaleo's failure to utter a single word in response to the pleas of her desperate family. As a father, I can only imagine the impact of that kind of silence on her, and it was hard for me to watch that footage of her lifeless body as he merely glared at her. Advertisement This was a prime example of poor policing. Garner's mother said she knew that if the officers would just say, "Stop resisting, I'm not going to hurt you," that Garner would have been fine. But instead of maintaining his composure, Pantaleo put his hands on Garner's neck and applied a chokehold. It is not necessary to apply a chokehold to bring a suspect under control; two officers beating a woman on the ground is sufficient, and that woman can be handcuffed and transported to the hospital. If a woman were being strangled to death, you can bet that panting and out of breath men would be on the ground. Pantaleo, who had been with the NYPD for 14 years, and had won the prestigious police commendation the year before for rescuing a drowning man, is now being honored with a public award. In a New York City where poor police response is commonplace, there is little that the NYPD can do to undo the bad reputation that Pantaleo has earned. On Sunday, all this will be front and center during Pantaleo's funeral, and people will be there to pay their respects. But what about the families of victims of police brutality? What are they saying, and what are they doing? Are they saying, "I understand, but I still want justice"? I cannot understand what it is that the families of victims, no matter their profession or wealth, are thinking. Are they thinking, "Pantaleo's a police officer, we're just the lowly people he brutalizes"? Do they feel robbed of some kind of justice because they don't get to 2d92ce491b
