Air pollution, often caused by vehicle emissions, has been associated with a number of conditions in humans. These conditions include heart and respiratory diseases, as well as inflammation, asthma, and cancer. The results of these studies, however, have not been consistent. Exposure to air pollutants has been linked to adverse pregnancy outcomes, including premature delivery and low birth weight. Additionally, many people experience fatigue and other symptoms after exposure to air pollutants. This condition is commonly referred to as air pollution related annoyance. Because air pollution has been associated with health outcomes and affects many people, it is important to understand how air pollution affects humans.

Search You are here Surgeons urge EU on meat hygiene standards Members of the European Parliament today urged the European Commission to take steps to ensure meat hygiene standards meet the needs of European consumers. The MEPs said meat hygiene rules are essential for food safety. Lise Legrand, MEP and shadow rapporteur for the report, said: "Today, we strongly urge the Commission to start a legislative process for meat hygiene rules. We are concerned that, as things stand, there is a massive gap between the standards currently in force in some Member States and those in force in others. "We would like to see our meat hygiene rules in line with those in force in our neighbouring countries, as well as the European standards adopted in the past." Rui Tavares, MEP, said: "Our desire to eat cleanly stems from our desire to live cleanly. We must all fight against infectious diseases, which can be spread by consuming contaminated food. The European Commission must act decisively in order to have adequate rules to ensure the traceability of animals and meat in the EU and promote the introduction of a standardised, European Union method for detecting antibiotics, hormones and traces of mycotoxins in food. This will in turn prevent harmful effects on health and animal health. "We would like to see
