Ocular metastasis of an anterior mediastinal tumor in a patient with Sézary syndrome. We describe a patient with extensive (Sézary) cell infiltration of the skin and mucosa, extensive erythroderma, and an anterior mediastinal tumor who had recurrent metastases in the retina. The tumor was composed of a spindle-cell proliferation with marked cytologic atypia, and it was surrounded by prominent perivascular sheathing of lymphocytes. Occasional aggregates of tumor cells demonstrated prominent nuclear pleomorphism and frequent mitotic activity. Immunohistochemical studies revealed that the tumor cells were positive for leukocyte common antigen, lysozyme, and a panel of T-cell-associated antigens, including UCHL1, HTLV-1/2, T-cell receptor gamma, CD45RO, CD8, and HLA-DR. Positive stains for B-cell-associated antigens, including LCA,

CD45, kappa, and lambda, were found in the reactive mantle zone lymphocytes. Our case differs from the previously described cases of leukemic-appearing reticulohistiocytoma, which was characterized by a spindle-cell proliferation, prominent cytologic atypia, and the presence of many multinucleate giant cells. Based on the morphology and immunophenotype, this case more closely resembles histiocytic reticulohistiocytoma of the skin, a neoplasm that has been recently recognized to be a variant of myeloid sarcoma and that has been reported in cases of cutaneous reticulum cell sarcoma and leukemic-appearing reticulohistiocytoma. Most of us know that there is a difference between analogical and logical thinking. However, it is possible to easily confuse these two modes of thinking, and as such, it is usually referred to as a fallacy of reasoning, rather than a fallacy of thinking. If this is the case, then you may not know where you get into trouble, or which situation it affects. In addition, the reasons for committing the fallacies are also often mistaken.
