Characteristics and effects of radiofrequency for pain control during transurethral surgery for benign prostatic hyperplasia. Radiofrequency for pain control during transurethral surgery for benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH) was conducted on 24 patients and then evaluated with particular reference to the usefulness of transurethral surgery for BPH. The patients were divided into two groups: group A included 16 patients treated with radiofrequency for pain control during transurethral surgery (RF group), and group B consisted of 8 patients undergoing the same operation without RF. Before and after the operation, the maximum flow rate (Qmax), residual urine volume (V), and score for pain (VAS) were compared in both groups. The preoperative Qmax and V were significantly less in group A than in group B. No patient in group A had preoperative V of > 50 ml or V > 15 in group A. Postoperative V was significantly decreased in both groups, but the greatest decrease was observed in group A. Both groups showed significant improvement in the postoperative Qmax and V in comparison with the preoperative ones. However, the postoperative Qmax and V showed no significant differences between groups. The score for pain and the number of patients with a score of 0 in group A (12.5%) were significantly lower than those in group B (100%). In conclusion, radiofrequency, in combination 2d92ce491b
