A proposal to abolish America's cash bail system is attracting attention nationwide and in Harris County. Under the proposed legislation, judges could put a defendant on house arrest or community service instead of requiring them to post a cash bond. "Cash bail is inhumane and unconstitutional," said Sen. Leticia Van De Putte, D-San Antonio, and the author of the legislation. "We have proposed to create an alternative way of handling those who are accused of a crime. It is a way that we can address the root of the problem, which is that people don't have access to the resources they need to make bail and stay out of jail." The legislation is expected to be taken up in January by the Texas Senate. Josie Castillo, chief of the Harris County Criminal Justice Center, said it is a "significant step toward jail reform in Texas." "Harris County is at the forefront of jail reform and knows the inefficiencies inherent in the current system," she said. Under the system, as it is currently being used in Harris County, judges set bail, and bail is determined by the crime alleged, financial means, criminal history, and the defendant's likelihood of appearing in court, she said. "This type of system only serves to separate the innocent from the guilty," she said. The proposed legislation calls for judges to instead consider whether there are "community resources or other alternative methods to ensure the release of the accused," she said. Judges would also be required to set
